[I] 次の文章を読み、問いに答えよ。

A picture of a smartphone with a red line through it serves as a warning in the window of a hairdresser's shop in a French village that has voted to restrict people's use of their phones. "Everyone is struggling with too much screen time," said Ludivine, a cardiology nurse, as she had her hair cut into a bob, leaving her phone out of sight in her bag. "I voted in favor. This could be a solution."

Seine-Port, in the Seine-et-Marne area south of Paris, with a population of fewer than 2,000 people, last weekend voted yes in a referendum to restrict smartphone use (1), banning adults and children from scrolling on their devices while walking down the street, while sitting with others on a park bench, while in shops, cafes or restaurants, and while parents wait for their children in front of the school gates. People who usually check their phone's map when they get lost are instead being encouraged to ask for directions.

The village has also approved a charter for families on children's use of screens: no screens of any kind in the morning, no screens in bedrooms, no screens before bed or during meals. If parents of teenagers (2) a written agreement not to give their child a smartphone before the age of 15, the town hall will provide the child with an old-fashioned handset for calls only.

"I'm totally in favor of this," said Ludivine, 34, who has two children aged one and four. "Some say it's an attack on freedoms, but I don't think so. It's about raising awareness of the impact of phones in our lives. My one-year-old has zero screens. My four-year-old has no screens on a school day. A lot of children and adults are intoxicated by screens—even babies in pushchairs scroll phones. This is about replacing that with more human contact."

A total of 277 people turned out to vote—about 20% of the electoral register—with 54% in favor of the charter. The mayor, Vincent Paul-Petit, of the right-wing party Les Républicains, will now write a municipal decree on smartphone use, the first of its kind in France. It is not enforceable by police—officers could not stop or fine people scrolling in the street because there is no national law against smartphones—but the mayor describes it as a recommendation to stop scrolling and guidance for limiting phone use. Shopkeepers are being encouraged to put up stickers in windows and gently ask people to (4).

In the village bar, the restaurant manager Angélique da Silva said she was unlikely to ask customers to stop scrolling, but she saw its purpose. "It's an interesting idea for children," she said. "But the younger generation doesn't approve of this because if you take their (5) away, they have nothing. They grew up with phones in their hands, not like our generation."

"I want to preserve public spaces from the smartphone invasion," said Paul-Petit. "It's not about banning all phones. It's about proposing that people stop getting out their smartphones to scroll social media, play a game or watch videos in public places, which we want to preserve for social life. This is about the addiction element of smartphones, whether games or social networks, when we can no longer tear our eyes from the screens. We'll encourage a baker or a butcher not to serve someone who comes in scrolling on their phone: if they're having a conversation on their phone, they can finish it outside, then come in and say hello."

He added: "Teenagers walking down the street almost all have their phone in their hand. I understand that the word 'ban' can offend some people. But what is important is opening up a debate."

Young people in the village complained there were not enough facilities for teenagers who had little to amuse them but their phones. The mayor has promised a film club, book exchanges and facilities for sport. Adrien, 17, a high school student who wants to be an actor, said: "Smartphones are such an important part of our lives that I don't think it's possible to restrict them in the streets." He has had a phone since the age of 11, listens to music on it in the street, uses it in school and uses the GPS for finding his way.

"It's a (7) thing," said Jean-Luc Rodier, a recently retired postal worker who voted in favor of the restrictions. "I'm too old to keep up with artificial intelligence and ChatGPT. I'm not generally in favor of bans, but this is about raising the alarm on phone use." His son Gabriel, 20, also a postal worker, was against it. "I spend five hours a day on my phone, which I think is reasonable. I also read actual books. But I like looking things up on my phone in the street. You can't ban knowledge at your fingertips."

Edible Way is a community participatory edible landscaping project in Matsudo, Japan, one of the commuter towns for people working in Tokyo. Matsudo is also an aging, shrinking, and isolated society, a typical example in current Japan. There are 25,317 elderly single-person households in Matsudo, and this number has increased by twenty-thousand households over the past 20 years. As a countermeasure, 12. Edible Way is aimed at contributing to people's communication and creating a social network for local resilience. The goal is improving the community and building a preventive safety network, in other words, providing a feeling of reliance and a sense of security that will support people in the community during emergencies.

Recently, 13. They cover a range of areas such as community-building, environment, local food production, social interaction, community engagement, and so on. However, it is difficult to develop edible landscapes in public spaces in Japan. Thus, we developed Edible Way with potted gardening. This is a traditional urban gardening method in Japan, done by placing movable planters in private spaces along the streets. The project produced edible landscapes through individuals' gardening activity.

The word "way" in Edible Way means both the physical space of the street and the methods of edible landscaping. The residents support this by watering the vegetables, and they can eat them when they want. We organize eating-together events to create casual connections between residents, utilizing the kitchens in vacant houses. The planters are small in scale, but they are suitable for the urban food project and community building.

Edible Way was initiated by a group of graduate students at Chiba
